Calabria is characterized by various settlements, towns, and villages often dating back to the Middle Ages, or arising from the various groups (Greeks, Romans, Byzantines, Normans, Arabs, Angevins, Spanish, French), who have lived in this area of southern Italy as a result of various rulers over the centuries.

All have left their cultural heritage and history, visible in the architecture, Mediterranean traditions of Calabria, peasant rituals, and religious holidays, and also in the products and dishes that retain qualities from past times.

Each group has left, in a different way, an indelible mark on the cuisine and Calabrian food, which today is valued all over the world. As evidence of this, there are various spices and many flavors present in Calabrian food: oregano, wild fennel, mint, peperoncino (hot pepper), cinnamon, cloves, nutmeg, etc. Calabria's food heritage, therefore, is a trip across centuries, with clear examples that explain how to enhance the many culinary traditions and use the various food resources produced from the land to satisfy, above all, family and personal needs.

Calabrian cuisine is a multifaceted culinary tradition with a particularly impressive collection of desserts and with rituals for dish preparation and conservation of local products, in most cases related to ancient religious, rural, and sea cultures.
